CONTINUISM – A New Theory of Political and Social Reflection

Hélder Augusto Barbosa Araújo

Introduction

Continuism is a theory of political and social reflection that argues that a civilization prospers when it preserves fundamental projects across multiple generations. It recognizes the value of democracy and change but maintains that certain strategic policies should not depend solely on electoral cycles.

Fundamental Principle

No generation should interrupt fundamental projects inherited from previous generations without an objective justification based on the public interest and the benefit of future generations.

Principles

- Continuity – National institutions and projects should evolve gradually, avoiding constant changes driven by partisan interests.
- Intergenerational Responsibility – Each generation has the duty to pass on a stronger and more resilient society to the next.
- Strategic Stability – Areas such as education, science, justice, infrastructure, and the environment require a long-term vision.
- Responsible Reform – Change is legitimate when it demonstrably improves what already exists, rather than simply reflecting a change of government.

Objective

To build a society in which progress results from intelligent continuity, ensuring that major national projects endure beyond political alternations and serve the development of civilization as a whole.
